

If the FCC and FAA have now decided that it is safe to allow the use of cellphones on airplanes, then it should be allowed, no question.

People who say that they shouldn't be allowed because it annoys them have no right to impose behavior control on fellow passengers. Otherwise it should be illegal for people to snore, pass wind, and hog the arm rest between you and the next passenger, but currently no such legislation exists, now should it.

I suspect that the people who are most against the use of cellphones because of potential disturbance are the least tolerant of people, and are probably only concerned because they themselves speak very loudly on the phone and therefore think that others are as selfish.

The reality is that the majority of people are considerate when using cellphones, and their use should not be prohibited.

Note that cellphones on airplanes could also be used to send text messages and to browse the internet, both of which are not disturbing to others. I am sure that the silent majority of travelers would like to be able to use cellphones in the air. I have heard that the majority are against it, but I disagree. This is a classic example of the silent majority allowing the vociferous minority to impose their views on others, by remaining silent. PLEASE - I ask anyone in favor to make their voices heard before it's too late. There should NEVER be legislation against people talking in public, just because it disturbs others.
